in ICT, breeding, and new markets hold promises for an innovative agriculture sector but would need to be further developed to take into account different types of farmers' needs. To meet these challenges and grasp the opportunities offered by innovation, farmers need to become knowledge workers. This workshop will address innovation needs and discuss policy answers regarding knowledge creation, transfer and sharing.

PARALLEL
SESSION 4

Rural viability

Room: Maple Suite

Kick off presentations by

- Hans-Olof Stålgren, Senior Officer at the Swedish Rural Network and Policy Area Coordinator for Fishery and Aquaculture for the Baltic Sea Region
- Carmen Hubbard, Senior Researcher, Centre of Rural Economy and lecturer in the School of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development, Newcastle University, UK

Demographic changes bring new opportunities but also challenges to the wider rural economy. Rural exodus reduces skills and knowledge needed to promote rural entrepreneurship. In some areas, this is further exacerbated by a lack of basic services. At the same time, rural areas can benefit from an influx of highly skilled urban dwellers. Broadband and ICT developments are breaking down many boundaries and rural areas must pick up on this trend and promote smart solutions and benefit from the growth in the digital economy. Improving rural-urban linkages could promote rural competitiveness and reduce the rural-urban drift of the population. A more integrated approach at regional level between villages and urban centres coupled with a better management of the rural-urban interactions can increase growth opportunities, job creation and quality of life. Rural areas also offer solutions for new societal challenges such as for instance the need to integrate migrants and refugees. Some rural areas have successfully turned this challenge into an opportunity, adding new skills and critical mass for the provision of basic services.
